1904-1947:

(Note: During this period Divisions, Districts and Brigades were transferred between Commands. For ease of access they are therefore listed separately from the Commands to which they belonged.)

In 1920 Northern and Southern Armies were renamed Commands. The geographic responsibilities of the new Northern and Southern Commands were reduced by the establishment of two new commands. In a return to the pre-war division of India swept away in 1907 as part of the Kitchener reforms Eastern and Western Commands were re-established.

Eastern Command was placed in overall command of the new United Provinces District, which replaced the Meerut Division and the 8th (Lucknow) Division, and of the new Presidency and Assam District, essentially an upgrading of the former Presidency Brigade. The United Provinces District (HQ: Meerut) was ranked as a First-Class District with, initially, six Brigades while the Presidency and Assam District was ranked as a Second-Class District with no subordinate brigades. Allahabad Brigade was independent of the Districts and was controlled directly by HQ Eastern Command until 192 . Delhi Brigade was detached from the United Provinces District and became an independent brigade group in 192 .

Western Command was placed in overall command of the new Baluchistan District, which replaced the former 4th (Quetta) Division and of two new Second-Class Districts: Waziristan District and Sind-Rajputana District. Sind-Rajputana District was formed through the upgrading of the former Karachi Brigade but also controlled the Nasirabad Brigade Area in Rajputana. Waziristan District, removed from Northern Command, initially controlled four infantry brigades, the same number as the First-Class Baluchistan District. The ongoing importance of Waziristan and the need to station substantial numbers of troops there led in 192 to the return of Waziristan District to Northern Command. Zhob Brigade Area was independent of Baluchistan District and was controlled directly by Western Command from 192 .

Within Northern Command 1st (Peshawar) Division became Peshawar District, 2nd (Rawalpindi) Division became Rawalpindi District and the 16th Division was renamed Lahore District. A new Second-Class District was however established-Kohat District-from the upgrading of the former Kohat Brigade. This new districtm bordering on Waziristan, also required substantial numbers of troops to keep the peace.

Southern Command controlled the new Central Provinces District, which replaced the 5th(Mhow) Division, and the new Poona District, which replaced Poona Division. These two Districts were ranked as First-Class Districts. Bombay however was detached from Poona Division and became a new Second-Class District through the upgrading of the former Bombay Brigade. Madras District, a new Second-Class District, replaced the former 9th (Secunderabad) Division, but with control of only one brigade at Bangalore. Burma District was initially placed under Southern Command but became an Independent District in 192 under the control of Indian Army HQ.
